Trial of the ABC Company games in learning process.

Students involved in the experiment.

The students from 10-11 forms were divided in several groups, including 40 students from the 10th form and 30 students from the 11th form. The age of the participants ranged from 15 to 18 years old.

How the work was organised.

10th form students were suggested to do some tasks with teachers in classrooms. 11th form students worked personally at home or after the lessons without any teacher's instructions.

Field of subjects.

10 th form students made attempts to work out some new Grammar aspects connected with Grammar Tenses, Indirect Questions, Modal Verbs and Articles. 11 th form students revised vital previously learned material: Idioms, Phrasal Verbs, Synonyms and Antonyms.

Range of exercises.

10th form students were offered to work with tasks involving filling missing words in various texts. 11th form students predominantely dealed with tests based on multiple choice.

Results of the experiment.

In both cases there was marked significant improvement in quality of students' knowledge. ~~Statistics shows that~~ The analysis of work showed that 70% students now are more successful during passing related to the studied material exams.

Students evaluation of the programme.

10th form students were more enthusiastic about the experiment because it appeared that their tasks were created in a more entertaining way. In contrast, 11th form students reckoned that they were doing very monotonous work and that made them be less optimistic about the trial in general.

Brief summary and recommendations.

The trial was a useful experience for both students and school ~~th~~ teachers. The results are extremely promising. However, the producers of the game ~~ou~~ ought to make more involving exercises for 11th form students in order to increase their interest in game itself and in learning process.
