~~study~~ A person's timetable can say a lot about their lifestyle - and young people, students in particular, live very diverse lives. To research this subject, I have collected and assessed statistical data on the timetables of USA students by using online polls. This data is presented in the charts attached to the report.

In general, about a third of the day - 7 to 9 hours - is spent on sleep. The rest of it is divided between classes, extracurricular activities, working and free time. Most of the students who have a part-time job dedicate roughly the same amount of time to the job and to studying. These two activities sum up to just about six hours per day.

The first major difference between years 2014 and 2015 is the amount of sleep. In 2015, students spend on average one and a half hours less time sleeping than in 2014. As a substitute, up to nine hours (as opposed to the previous year's 5,3 hours) are dedicated to leisure, sports and traveling. Studying gets an hour less as well, as the idea of pursuing a career before finishing education begins to catch on. As the students get more free time, they can also afford spending more time on meals.

The research has shown that in 2015, the students of USA have been living more active lives than the year before. However, that comes at the cost of lower education quality, as well as sleep. Whether this is good or bad is different for each person, of course.
