The report on "The English Games" experiment,

for Maria Burkova the school headmaster.

Not a long time ago ^{some} the students of ~~my~~ ^{our} school were offered to try out the Computer-Based Games for English Learners made by the ABC company. You will find a detailed description of the experiment below.

Art Forty students from ~~tenth~~ form divided into four groups and thirty students from ~~eleventh~~ form divided ~~into~~ into three groups took part in the experiment. The younger ones experienced the games in their class with the teacher, while everyone else did it at home or after their classes without the tutor. Prep. The students from tenth form were offered to new grammar material such as:
Sequence of Tenses;
Indirect Questions;
Modal verbs;
Articles.

Prep. The students had to fill the gaps.
On the other hand, the ~~teenagers~~ from eleventh grade had been drilling the following vocabulary material:
Idioms;
Phrasal Verbs;
Synonyms and Antonyms.
These students had to do the multiple choice test.

Art. All results were checked and analysed, they also were compared to the amount of mistakes made in previous tests on the same topics. The result was predictable. All students made less mistakes than they had made before. After the experiment the teenagers were asked to describe their feelings with one word. The majority of the younger students rated their experience as "exciting", however the older ones described it as "boring".

In conclusion I'd like to point out that it is obvious that the games really helped the students. If I had a right to decide what to do, I would offer such games to teenagers every day.
