Computer Based Games for English Learners experiment report.

Written by James Neutron.

The following report contains information and results of an experiment in learning English. The software used in the experiment (Computer Based Games for English Learners, CBGEL) was provided as a free trial by the ABC company. prep.

1. Organisation.

Art Students of the 10th and 11th grades were chosen to take part in the experiment. Forty students of the 10th grade were divided into four groups while thirty students of the 11th grade were divided into three. Participants of the 10th grade had to complete the tasks in the game in class with a teacher. The 11th grade participants were allowed to do the exercises after their classes or at home.

2. Usage of the CBGEL.

Art Students of the different grades were provided with different learning material to fit their school program. The 10th grade participants were introduced to a new grammar material. The 11th grade participants had tasks focused towards revising already learned vocabulary. prep / Art

Art Types of the exercises were different, too. All 10th graders had to fill in the gaps while the 11th graders were presented with multiple choice questions.

3. Results and recommendations.

The CBGEL experiment was successful. All participants have shown better test results after the games. However, while the 10th grade enjoyed the exercises, most of the 11th grade found it boring. As a recommendation, I would suggest adding a wider variety of exercises to the 11th grade students' area of studies prep to make it more appealing to them.
